Additional information As a business owner, it's important to familiarize yourself with the four basic elements of the marketing mix. This is commonly referred to as four P marketing and includes products, prices, placements and promotions. Distribution channels are an important component of product placement. It represents a route or route where your product moves until they reach the end customer. Manufacturers can sell directly to customers or contact them via various distribution channels. In general, the place where the goods produced is not the same as the place of use. For example, a computer manufacturer is unlikely to sell directly to the end customer. They will sell the product through an authorized retailer, wholesaler or distributor. A typical distribution strategy will involve one or more intermediaries. The only exception is direct distribution. In this case, the manufacturer will contact the customer directly. They can sell through a specific retail location or have all the elements in its distribution channels. By cutting middlemen, they will have better control over products and deliver savings to customers. There are four main types of distribution channels, and have their own characteristics. It includes: Direct distribution channels Indirect distribution channels Selected selected selected distribution channels Manufacturers who choose indirect distribution channels can sell to wholesalers who in turn distribute the goods to the retailer. The end customer will buy the product from the grocery store. Experts use various classification of distribution channels in marketing. Some say that there are only three channels. Others categorize them based on the number of intermediaries. You may see terms such as double distribution, reverse distribution, extensive distribution, three-tiered channels, etc. Multiple distribution, for instance, involves a mixture of direct and indirect sales. Manufacturers can sell directly to customers as well as to retailers or wholesalers. Reverse distribution is the practice of collecting damaged or outdated goods and selling or returning it to the manufacturer. For example, a client can recycl the electronics and send it to the manufacturer to make a profit. There are examples of endless distribution that you can use to develop your own strategy. Let's say you want to make sure the availability of widespread goods. In this case, you can choose mass distribution or intensive distribution. Chewing gum, soda, pens and other commonly used products are available in most stores, from petrol stations to newspaper kiosks to supermarkets. Luxury brands typically use selected distribution strategies. Designer shoes, for example, are only available in luxury stores and premium grocery stores. Now that you know the different types of distribution channels, decide how you will sell your products to the end customer. Consider your audience and its features. Where do your customers spend their time? Do they prefer to go online or in-store shopping? Millennials, for example, spend about six hours a week shopping online. Seniors dedicate only two and a half hours each week to online shopping. If your product appeals to senior citizens, consider selling your products instead of online. Factor in your budget as well. The more intermediaries you use, the less you get each sales. Also, be careful with channel conflicts when developing your distribution strategy. This usually happens when a manufacturer starts a sales rep, retailer, merchant and other partner from a distribution channel. Consider the types of items you sell as well. Mobile products, such as fresh fruits and vegetables, have a short lifespan. Therefore, they need to be sold as soon as possible. If you have a small farm, you may want to sell your products in local markets and grocery stores. According to Gutter Supply, channel J is a trim that holds a soffit panel in the rightful place.
